

A Bagful of Teeth

Rachel comes home from her first term at Oxford to find that she has been designated by her family as carer to her grandmother Hannah, who has been traumatised by seeing her friend, Mr Patel a Pakistani shopkeeper attacked and mugged. Rachel barely knows her grandmother and is not happy with this duty. However as it unfolds she moves from reluctant, resentful, obligation to a place of wanting Hannah to get respect and hopefully closure, a cure for the unnerving, odd bouts of confusion that beset her. Unfortunately, closure is the very opposite of what actually happens to this can of very strange worms. The caring becomes a complicated voyage of discovery not only into Hannah's past life of Holocaust survival but also the past lives of her mother's family. From the pogroms and ghettos of Imperial Russia and prejudices of pre-war Austria Rachel comes face to face with her own prejudices against the Orthodox Jewish life and more importantly with the secrets that shaped and still control the present. This is a story about changes, welcome and unwelcome, changes in families, in faith, in culture. Immigrant or alien? Is homeland the place you come from or the place you've run to?
